

GLOBAL PERSPECTIVES ON LEGAL HISTORY

A Max Planck Institute for Legal History and Legal Theory
Open Access Publication Series

When Italy and Germany joined the 'scramble for Africa' and established colonies on the continent in the late 19th century, they, like other imperial powers before them, had to deal with the question of how to define the legal status of the inhabitants of these territories. This book takes Eritrea and German East Africa as case studies to comparatively analyze norms and practices of citizenship. It focuses on racism and other elements that influenced colonial governmentality.

Nicola Camilleri is a historian of modern Europe in a global perspective with a special interest in Italy and Germany and their colonial history. His research combines legal and institutional history with cultural and social history. He received his PhD from the Freie Universität Berlin in 2017.
